Padua, Italy

A "Nursery of the Arts"

- In the sixteenth century, Padua had one of the best universities in Europe it was a college town
- Galileo was one of the professors during this time and the hall where he lectured still stands
- The university also has the first-ever anatomy theatre; the school led the way in medicine and natural philosophy

Padua Fast Facts

- Located 25 miles from Venice in northern Italy
- Another famous resident of Padua included the poet Dante (author of "The Divine Comedy")
- St Anthony of Padua is buried there
- Botanical garden (1545) is the oldest in Europe
- Also spelled Padova and Padoa

The "Bad Quarto"

The version of The Taming of the Shrew that is best known – and attributed to Shakespeare – was published with the First Folio in 1623. However, an anonymous quarto was published in 1594, entitled The Taming of a Shrew. There are many parallels between the two texts (see below) but there are many more differences.

Things that are the same:

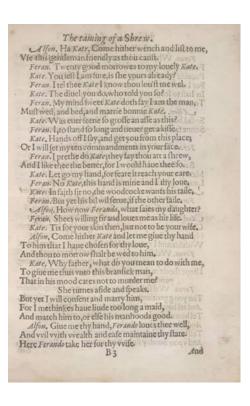

- Katherine and Christopher Sly both appear with the same names
- The structure/plots are the same: taming Kate, wooing the younger sister(s), the framing device of Christopher Sly
- Some language is very similar, though it is attributed to different characters

Things that are different:

- A Shrew is 60% the length of The Shrew
- It takes place in Greece, not Italy
- All the characters minus Kate and Sly have different names
- The Christopher Sly framing device has an ending that does not exist in The Shrew (some productions will actually use this ending, or provide their own)
- Kate has two sisters

Here are the most popular theories about this "bad quarto" (there are a lot more):

- Shakespeare wrote A Shrew and later revised substantially
- Somebody else (maybe an actor in the production, or someone in the audience trying to "pirate" Shakespeare's work) wrote down A Shrew from memory...and did a really bad job
- One version is an adaptation of the other, perhaps competing versions of the same story
- Or maybe a combination of all the above?
